ADELINE DALEY

The Making of the President

With so many best-sellers as (A) moving, (B) on the bookstands revealing starting a rumor that you can't make cupcakes, (C) having your kids expelled from school, (D) remaining single or (E) getting pregnant. (For the latter, of course, you'll have to refer to another type text.)

The book would begin with a search for a candidate being conducted in a smoke-filled kitchen by the nominating committee which finally settle on a poor, harassed mother of several small-children who is spotted as presidential timber because she has never turned down a Room Mother appointment or thought of an excuse fast enough to avoid serving as chairman of the Rag Drives.

It is decided that the best time to tell her she has been nominated is to telephone her while she is taking a bath. Who can argue with only a towel draped around you while dripping water on the carpets?

The high point of the book would be the night of the election in which our candidate wins overwhelmingly. In fact, there are only two "nay" votes — her own and her husband's. But this isn't too surprising because the public opinion polls indicated it and besides, she was the only name on the ballot.

The book would provide an inside report of her life as president, once she is elected. One chapter would be devoted to an explanation of the One Big Fiasco in her administration, similar to the 150 different versions being written about the Bay of Pigs episode. This, of course, would be the PTA Rummage Sale in which, inadvertently, she turned in two of her husband's suits.

But, ah, what a lonely life a PTA president leads. Especially when she attempts to make Room Mother and Rag Drive appointments. All she hears from her constituents is — (A) we're moving, (B) my kids were expelled, (C) I'm pregnant... etc.
